Why does my heart keep young? It is out of keeping with

She unlocked the door, and went down stairs calm and grave, the shadowy smile that had haunted her all day quite swept

Later on that same evening in Lady Andrewes' rooms, in Berkeley-street, a pleasant party was assembled; but that was scarcely stronge, for Lady Andrewes had a happy knack of getting the right people together; and on this hot July evening they seemed to enjoy themselves in all varieties of fashion, from the charmed audience gathered round the piano in one room to those listening to the lightest gossip of the hour, and its attendant flirtation, about the wide open windows that looked into the silent night.

"How beautifully Mrs. Jardyne plays! some one remarked; and there was a pause in the low hum of conversation to listen to one of Mendelssohn's tender, wordless songs -music that seemed to come from Denis's heart, and that, as she played, seemed to herself and others stamped with her own sad individuality "Who did you say was playing?" a quickvoice asked-the voice of a man who had been standing for a few minutes behind the player; and as he put his question, he leaned forward to try and gain a glimpse of the musician's face. Before the question received an answer there was a jarring discord that killed the sweet sounds, and Mrs. Jardyne rose to her feet, with a gasp as if for breath. But in a moment, with a word of apology for the mistake she had made, she was quiet and grave as ever, and she walked the whole length of the room on the arm of the man who had been standing by her side, ere she paused, and turned her eyes back in the direction whence she had come.

What she saw, when she did so, was a bearded, bronzed man, with the eager blue eyes she had thought of so often, and seen in so many a weary vigil; eyes that had To whom is it given to look back ten years. | matched so well the young, confident voice. And by his side stood a slender brown-
